ABSTRACT:

An improved method and system for logging transaction records in a computer system. The method may include writing a confirmation log record to the log file for a transaction that completes normally, and not writing a confirmation log record for transactions that are aborted. The log file may be unloaded periodically by an unload program. The unload program may write transaction log records accompanied by a confirmation log record to a good output file and transaction log records not accompanied by a confirmation log record to a suspended output file. On a subsequent execution, the unload program may combine the log records in the log file and the suspended file. The unload program may write transaction log records accompanied by a confirmation log record to a good output file. The unload program may write transaction log records not accompanied by a confirmation log record and which have not exceeded a transaction time limit to a suspended output file. The unload program may write transaction log records not accompanied by a confirmation log record and which have exceeded a transaction time limit to a disposal output file. The transaction log records in the good output file may then be processed normally by log processing programs.

ABSTRACT:

A microprocessor manipulated program which extracts the data inherent in the cognitive process leading to the spoken or written word and converts that data into business models capable of defining the interrelationship and functions of a business. The program models the business and the data thus generated is used to produce application software program code capable of controlling and/or performing all functions of the business. The system springs from The Connected Development Process of Four Dimensional Cognitive Modeling using the four basic linguistic entities of PROCESS and its attendant adjuncts of DATA, CONTROL and SUPPORT.

ABSTRACT:

A database organization system that separates fields used for record selection into a search table, leaving fields used solely for retrieval in a separate detail table. The system constructs a bit-interleaved key field within the search table, causing records with similar field values to cluster. The system further partitions the tables into multiple pairs of sub-tables as size increases, and builds a statistics table with information describing each partitioned sub-table. Each sub-table is searched separately and the results merged. The bits of the bit-interleaved key are ordered by likelihood of data query, and the partitioning is performed using the value of each bit. The system keeps statistics for each partition, and allows parallel searching of each partition. Query speed is enhanced by culling sub-tables from the search process, by reading only the search table data, and by eliminating record-level tests on tables completely within the desired result set.
